Introduction

A few weeks ago I was interested in knowing what conditions had to be met to immigrate to Canada.
It turns out that currently they no longer place restrictions regarding age or gender.
There is also interest in anyone as long as they fill a position in Canada to be able to emigrate there.
In a YouTube ad I realized that they were requesting a concierge for a hotel, who would maintain the building. Although I have personally worked in maintaining my own home, I have never worked for a hotel.
However, one of the requirements was that he had experience shoveling snow.
The truth is that in any part of Latin America that is below the 25th parallel it is very difficult to find someone who has ever had to shovel snow.
In some places in Chihuahua in Mexico or in the border area with the United States, snow sometimes falls.
Further south, the only place where snow falls is at the top of Popocatépetl.
Further south in Central America it is impossible to see snow. When there is a lot of hail, and only once every 50 years.
You have to travel to Colombia in the Andes, and climb to the Ruiz snow-capped mountain to find some snow.
Along the coast of South America it is practically impossible to see snow, unless you go up somewhere in the Andes mountain range.
Of course, any Chilean who has gone up to the place where a plane crashed nearly 50 years ago, where the survivors had to practice cannibalism to endure the winter, has probably seen snow.
And of course some Argentinian from Bariloche, or some region near Aconcagua has seen or been close to snow. We must remember that “The Revenant” was filmed in that area in the south of Argentina, because there was snow there at a time of year when it was not in Oregon.
I repeat, in the Caribbean and Central America region, snow is practically unknown.
